Summary: This article takes into consideration the perspectives of families receiving evidence-based mental health interventions and what potential barriers or challenges can arise during the process. It combines these perspectives with those in the child welfare system to deliver recommendations for adapting mental health services for child welfare settings.

Application: The blended approach of both caregiver and professional perspectives allows this article to have a broad application. While many academic resources may be more tailored to the professional perspective, this article is more useful for caregivers who want to strengthen relationships with their children and overcome obstacles to getting them treatment.
